Tonight's experiment was another failure. My creation didn't obtain true life. It just turned into a zombie. More research is needed.

I've found the reason for my failures. The magic won't take hold unless the light of the full moon strikes the experimental setup from directly overhead, so that the moon rays act parallel to gravity. But the Moon doesn't pass through the zenith of the sky except when viewed from near the equator, and even then, it doesn't pass directly overhead often enough to be of much use. I need to construct a coelostat on the roof to steer the moonlight into a vertical beam.

Another failure. What am I doing wrong? Where is the problem?

I've found the cause of my failures. The experiment liquid I'm using isn't suited for terrestrial creatures. Next time I'll make the body out of parts from sea creatures. Guess this means I won't be able to use the organs from that panther I've been keeping. What a waste, after all the money I've spent on sausages for that thing.
